3. PROPOSAL SPECIFICATION

Scope of Work

3.1. EA Tools Background

As part of the EA strategy to mature the EA practice at the CSIR, a key requirement is to investigate the use of software tools for enterprise architecture to provide a repository for storing, organising and conveniently accessing all architectural information. The EA repository must be able to store all the architecturally significant elements related to different EA domains, e.g. business, applications, data, integration, security and infrastructure, as well as all the relationships existing between these elements.

The key value proposition of a software tool for enterprise architecture is to maintain a dedicated architectural repository which will allow architects to capture the structure of the IT landscape, including the properties of different IT assets and relationships between them. The EA tool will help capture, store and share the architectural information between architects and fulfil the general role of a common knowledge base of reference materials on the IT landscape.

3.2. Current status

Currently, EA artefacts are managed on spreadsheets, documents, and various ad hoc repositories. This limits our capability to provide strong analytical capabilities such as modelling and visualization capabilities to enable an effective multi-purpose analysis of the architectural information available, which a dedicated EA repository can provide, i.e. architecture impact analysis capability.

The use of an Architecture repository can help us capture the interrelationships between the information from different types of EA artefacts, e.g. the relationship between systems, processes, technologies, applications, services and data types.

3.3. Requirements

The EA tool must provide the ability to store, control and manipulate numerous objects and entities important for information systems planning. These objects will include business capabilities, processes, initiatives, systems, applications, databases, data entities, servers and any other relevant artefacts from applying EA planning to business and IT alignment.

We need to understand the various EA software tool capabilities from vendors of EA tools in the market (preferably cloud-based EA Tools) to meet our specific requirements for an EA tool.

3.4. Key Vendors

Below are the key vendors we propose to investigate based on Gartner and Forrester Magic Quadrant™ for Enterprise Architecture Tools:

- LeanIX
- Orbus Software
- MEGA
- Avolution
